The bankers who broke the world

Astonishingly clear here the decision made by a small number of central banks across the common currency area to keep interest rates at historically low levels. The officials of six of the world’s leading central banks, the most powerful financial authorities at the time, met behind closed doors and agreed to keep rates at very low levels. The fifty-dollar notes in the wallets of billions of Americans, the Brazilian, the Chinese, the German, the Japanese, and the British were fatigue—American borrowers, Chinese dealers, and Thai investors. This decision was the fiscal equivalent of the Berlin Wall. It started the end of a world that the world has been dreaming of since the 1980s. It brought the end of an era when the United States was the guarantor of the world’s monetary system.
